SECTION A-READING

(7 marks)

Read the passage and answer the questions that follow

Human beings are the leading cause of plants and animals becoming endangered or extinct. An endangered species has so few members that the species may die out. If we don't do something to protect an endangered species, they will be gone forever. We will not have any more of that kind of plant or animal on Earth.

The most dangerous thing humans do to endangered animals is destroy their habitats or places where they live. This is usually because we do not pay very close attention. When there is an area of land we want to use, we don't notice what is already living there.

Many tropical forests, or rainforests, have been destroyed by humans. People wanted the land and wood for building projects. Countless plants and animals have been lost in this one habitat alone. We are just beginning to discover medicines and other resources there. We might lose that knowledge if more species die out.

When a town expands, more houses and businesses are built. The town pushes the local wildlife far from its natural habitat. Wetlands and grasslands are especially at risk.

Thankfully, people are more aware of the problem. This is the first step toward protecting habitats.
